remarkable things in the collection are specimens of the quadrumant—the gorilla and the chimpanzee, a male and female. The male is lifty-two inches about the chest, with arms longer than its legs, and larger round than a man's thigh. No living specimen was ever captured, and so great is their strength and conning, that the lask can hardly ever be accomplished. The Nichiego, is very intelligent, the sexes living in pairs, and huilding houses. Another, the Vioolo-Kamha, has such a growth of the hair and whiskers, as to give it a human appeurance except that no man ever appeared so fierce.
